David A. Hoffman, Esq.
Lecturer on Law at Harvard Law School and Instructor at the Program on Negotiation

David A. Hoffman teaches courses on mediation, collaborative law, legal ethics, and diversity at Harvard Law School, where is the John H. Watson, Jr. Lecturer on Law.

He is also the founding member of Boston Law Collaborative, LLC, where he serves as an arbitrator, mediator, negotiator, and Collaborative Law attorney.

This full-day program dedicated to the best practices in Negotiation, Mediation, Arbitration, and Collaborative Law, will provide an overview of developments in the major areas of alternative dispute resolution.

Negotiation: Recent developments in the psychology of negotiation have provided new tools for understanding how to overcome the cognitive barriers and emotional elements that complicate the task of negotiation.

Mediation: Video technologies have broadened the availability of mediation globally, while greater awareness of diversity, equity, and inclusion issues in mediation has provided new tools for fostering understand and reaching agreement.

Arbitration: While arbitration has begun to look more and more like litigation, experienced arbitrators using creating methods of streamlining arbitration and making it more efficient.

Collaborative Law: Although the advent of collaborative lawyering came from the area of family law, it is now broadening its scope to other areas of legal practice, where it will prove to be just as useful.
